

SUMMARY

JOHN FINNEY WELLS HOUSE HA-1555

In 1907, this estate belonging to John Finney Wells was advertised in a bankruptcy suit as comprising "a large farm house containing 15 rooms, frame barn, cow stables, horse stable with shed attached, large barrack, corn house and wagon house attached, meat house, hen house, wood house, canning house and warehouse all in good condition... 4 tenant houses, an orchard bearing fruit, and 16 acres of corn." John Finney Wells had purchase Luther Stewart's farm as well as the one belonging to his father, James Wells, in 1885 and 1890, respectively.

Unfortunately no longer "a very desirable and valuable property," the house is now a forlorn ruin on the edge of the Kennedy Highway. Deterioration has rendered the interior inaccessible, although the exterior suggests construction in several stages, the eastern third apparently later than the western two-thirds. The configuration of the house, the gable roof, pedimented dormers, rectangular brick chimneys, ell shape and five-bay long front facade is unusual for the area. Generally, houses here had a center front gable, and dormers were rarely seen on 19th century houses until 1860 or later. Also, houses were often added on to at the back, retaining an orderly facade, or at the front, creating a larger and more pretentious structure to precede the old one. Additions tacked on in a linear fashion broadening the facade were unusual (although the George Jones House [HA-1053] represents a smaller version). In this case, they served to magnify the impression of the building's size and to create quite an imposing structure, splendidly sited across the brow of a hill.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This two-story, gable-roofed clapboard house built in several parts is located on the east side of Stepney Road north of the Kennedy Highway (I-95).

This house is el-shaped; the five-bay by two-bay main section is on an east-west axis and faces south, with the two bay long ell attached to the east end of the north side. Most windows seem to have had 6/6 sash and, on the front at least, louvered shutters; gable windows have 3/6 sash. A one-story, shed-roofed porch with carved posts and brackets spans the south facade; the cornice is boxed with gable returns. There are three brick chimneys: in the main section, one in the west end and one between the second and third bays from the east; and, in the ell, one in the north end. The door in the west has four panels and a rosette knob; the door on the east has four raised panels and a four-light transom.

The house appears to have been constructed in several stages, although the chronology and configuration of those stages are difficult to determine. Two-story seams in the clapboarding divide the south and north facades into three parts: a one-bay wide section on the west with one window in each story and one dormer on both sides; a two bay wide center section with entrances in the first story west bay of both the north and south facades, windows in the east bay and second story, and one dormer on each side; and, finally, a two-bay wide section on the east with an entrance in the first story east bay flanked on the west by a window, and two windows in the second story. The ell covers the corresponding portion of the north side. The latter section has no dormers but has two gable windows in the east end.

The ell has a shed-roofed addition on the east side and entrances in the south bay of both sides.

The interior contains four rooms in the first story with a winding staircase in the northwest corner of the east room and a stairhall on the west side of the center section. There are fireplaces flanked by cupboards on both sides of the wall between the center and east section, and the east room has a beaded board wainscot.

East of the house is a board-and-batten outbuilding.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

In 1907, this estate belonging to John Finney Wells was advertised in a bankruptcy suit as comprising "a large farm house containing 15 rooms, frame barn, cow stables, horse stable with shed attached, large barrack (22 X 60 feet), corn house and wagon house attached, meat house, hen house, wood house, canning house, and warehouse all in good condition... 4 tenant houses, an orchard bearing fruit, and 16 acres of corn." Furthermore, it was located conveniently to churches, schools and stores and within easy reach of two railroads, the Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and the B & O," and was "a very desirable and valuable property."

It is difficult to determine who actually built the house. John Finney Wells purchased Luther Stewart's farm from James Stewart in 1885.¹ Wells paid Stewart $1935 and took out a mortgage for $1865 for 33 acres of "Whitakers Ridge," "Pritchards Security," and "The Agreement." Wells also purchased his father's farm--129 acres of "The Agreement" in 1890 for $7400.² There are no metes and bounds descriptions of either of the respective farms. The 1858 Jennings and Herrick Map shows a J. Wells on the west side of Stepney Road, south of Bush Chapel. On the east side of the road were buildings attributed to W. Hollis, L. Stewart, and Wilson. By 1878 Jas. Wells had moved to the east side of Stepney Road. (One local resident said that this was his farm.), as well as Wm. Hollis, Wheelwright's Shop, Harvey Osborn, and Luther Stewart.

Unfortunately no longer "a very desirable and valuable property," the house is now a forlorn ruin on the edge of the Kennedy Highway. Deterioration has rendered the interior inaccessible, although the exterior suggests construction in several stages, the eastern third apparently later than the western two-thirds. The configuration of the house, the gable roof, pedimented dormers, rectangular brick chimneys, ell shape and five-bay long front facade is unusual for the area. Additions tacked on in a linear fashion broadening the facade were unusual (although the George Jones house [HA-1053] represents a smaller version). In this case, they served to magnify the impression of the building's size and to create quite an imposing structure, splendidly sited across the brow of a hill.
